Round Background:

The ongoing conflict between Westphalia and Floraland has taken a new turn, as Floraland forces expand their operations into Westphalian territory. In response to the Floraland offensive, WeSoft Technologies has developed a mobile app called "The West Remembers." This app has sparked significant controversy for several reasons. It allows users to alert both civilians to dangerous areas and provide real-time location updates to Westphalian forces about Floraland troop movements. In an attempt to counter this, Floraland Military Captain Bannister has issued orders for his troops to detain any Westphalian person found with the app on their phone and label them as a civilian directly participating in hostilities.

As a result of these orders, numerous Westphalians have been detained, and in some instances, shot and killed. One particular case has drawn significant legal attention and led to growing calls for Captain Bannister to be charged with crimes. And so, in the chambers of the International Criminal Court begins the first act in the case against Captain Bannister.

May 1, 2024

The conflict involved between Floraland and Westphalian forces has expanded in to Westphalian territory. Wishing to defend their country from the forces they refer to as the “Floral Aggressors” or “F-As”, the Westphalian technology company WeSoft developed an application for mobile telephones called TheWestRemembers and popularly known as TWR in Westphalia. The application could be downloaded by anyone with a smartphone.

After downloading the application, users would have to create a login name and provide a Westphalian phone number to authenticate their accounts. Once accounts were approved, when a user logged in, they were prompted to share their locations. By touching a single button, they could report to TWR that at their location they had encountered:

- Mines (by touching ‘M’);
- Unexploded ordinance (by touching ‘U’);
- Damage to buildings, property, or the environment (by touching ‘D’);
- Dead bodies (by touching ‘B’); and
- Floralandian forces (by touching ‘F’).

Users were informed that WeSoft would pass the information they uploaded directly to the Westphalian military, which it in fact did. On at least two occasions, Westphalian armed forces successfully targeted Floralandian forces based on information they had received from TWR. These incidents of successful targeting took place within minutes of the information being provided to TWR.

The Westphalian President gave Wesoft CEO Mackenzie Gyver a medal for her company’s contribution to their country.

Users could also select to receive alerts. If they chose to receive alerts, they would receive alerts about the locations of mines, ordinance, or damaged buildings so that they could avoid dangerous situations.

The ICC Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) opened a preliminary examination into allegations of crimes committed during the conflict on its own initiative. It subsequently requested to open an investigation into ‘The Situation in Westphalia and Floraland’, and the Pre-Trial Chamber granted authorization to do so.

In the course of its investigation, OTP found evidence of the following facts:

- Captain Ames Bannister had issued a standing order to Floralandian forces that anyone their forces identified as having TWR installed on their phone would be detained and treated as a prisoner of war. OTP has obtained evidence this order was implemented and several persons were detained on the basis that they had TWR installed on their phones; and;
- On one occasion, on the night of January 1, 2024, a Floralandian unit had encountered a group of Westphalians dressed in civilian clothes. None were armed and none explicitly attempted to surrender. One Westphalian yelled “Quick, put the F-As on TWR!” Another Westphalian named Jack Hagar pulled out his phone and pressed a button. A Floralandian soldier yelled at him to stop, but he continued to tap his phone. Captain Bannister ordered the soldier to shoot Hagar, which he did, and Hagar died. No other civilians were physically harmed in the encounter, though three who were found to have installed TWR were detained as POWs. The gunfire damaged Hagar’s phone, and when it was initially picked up by Floralandian forces it had turned off and could not be powered back on due to the gunshot damage. However, a subsequent forensic search of Hagar’s phone revealed that he had downloaded and installed TWR and established an account on the app.

There have been reports which OTP has found collectively provide reason to believe that other Floralandian units also killed TWR users around the same time, but they are not part of this case and none of them have yet led to charges being filed at ICC. OTP does not allege that the persons detained pursuant to Captain Bannister’s order were physically abused during their detention.

The Prosecution has charged Captain Bannister under Article 25(3)(b) of the Rome Statute with one count of wilful killing as a war crime under Article 8(2)(a)(1), one count of directing an attack against civilians as a war crime under Article 8(2)(b)(1), and two counts of unlawful confinement of civilians under Article 8(2)(a)(7).

Floralandia’s army has a functioning court-martial system which has prosecuted service members for war crimes including wilful killing and unlawful detention, though none of the servicemembers who have been prosecuted for these crimes has received a substantial prison sentence. Early in the war, they issued a statement expressing their commitment to investigate allegations of international crimes and prosecute the perpetrators when and if they could be identified.

When the Chief Military Prosecutor became aware of these allegations, a military prosecutor interviewed members of the unit present at the shooting of Jack Hagar. The existence of the investigation became public and led to a massive outcry in Floralandia, where Bannister is a hero because of a well-known incident where he was wounded rescuing a unit pinned down by Westphalian fire.

Before the investigation was completed but after it became public (and after the resulting outcry), the Floralandian Parliament on March 23, 2024, passed a new retroactive law directing that TWR's programmers and administrators and any person who used it were directly participating in hostilities. Consequently, the military prosecutor closed the investigation against Captain Bannister and his soldiers, concluded that at the time he was shot Mr. Hagar was directly participating in hostilities, and that he was consequently a lawful target. No charges were filed.

OTP now requests that a Pre-Trial Chamber of the ICC confirm the charges against Captain Bannister under Article 61 of the Rome Statute and allow it to proceed to trial. The Defence has requested that the charges be dismissed before trial.

Pre-Trial Chamber VII has scheduled a hearing to be held in 90 minutes. It has asked the Prosecution and Captain Bannister's Defense to address three issues:

- 1. Whether the evidence as described satisfies the elements of the charges;
- 2. Whether the charges, if proven, are of sufficient gravity to be admissible under Article 17;
- 3. Whether the ICC should refrain from considering the case out of complementarity under Article 17.

In a shocking revelation, an audio transcript has been leaked to the public which exposes a disturbing conversation between Captain Ames Bannister, a Floralandian military officer accused of war crimes, and two of his subordinates. The audio, which was recorded covertly by one of the subordinates present during the conversation, highlights a callous and brutal attitude towards civilian casualties and raises serious questions about the conduct of Floralandian forces during the ongoing conflict.

The conversation, which took place in an undisclosed location, features Captain Bannister and his subordinates discussing the targeting of civilians using the TWR app, a mobile application developed in Westphalia to report the presence of Floralandian forces. Throughout the conversation, Captain Bannister appears to express a disturbing lack of concern for the potential misidentification of civilians as combatants. At one point, he even seems to suggest that he is grateful for the TWR app, as it provides more opportunities to carry out violent acts.

One of the subordinates in the conversation appears to be uncomfortable with the callous nature of the discussion, while the other displays a similarly brutal attitude towards the civilian population, aligning with Captain Bannister's views. This leaked audio transcript has sent shockwaves through the international community, and it is expected to play a significant role in any proceedings against Captain Bannister.

The full transcript of the leaked audio has been provided below. Please note that some readers may find the content of the conversation disturbing.

Audio begins with muffled background noise and footsteps, followed by the sound of a door opening]

Captain Bannister (CB): [laughing] Oh man, you won't believe this. We bagged another one of those TWR-using Westphalians last week.

Private Brian Tarmel: Seriously, sir? What went down this time?

CB: [chuckling] This little punk was actually on Snapchat! Yeah, he had TWR installed, but we caught him snapping a selfie with some idiotic dog filter.

Private Brian Tarmel: [laughs nervously] Uh, wow. That's something else.

Third Soldier (TS): [laughs] What a joke! Those Westphalians think they're so clever.

CB: I know, right? But we detained him regardless. If they're messing with that app, they're just like cockroaches scurrying about, spreading filth.

Private Jalen Langford : Exactly! They deserve what they get.

Private Brian Tarmel: Um, I guess so, sir. Erring on the side of caution?

CB: Precisely. They're a real pain, but it's our job to keep things under control. If they're dabbling with TWR, they're practically our enemies. In a twisted way, I'm almost grateful for TWR. It gives us an excuse to deal with them more...efficiently.

Private Brian Tarmel: [hesitantly] I can understand that Captain. So, what's the deal with the Snapchat individual now?

CB: He's locked up with the rest of them. He'll face the same consequences. They really should've thought twice before playing around with that app. But you know, sometimes a few mistakes are inevitable. Better safe than sorry, I say.

Private Jalen Langford: Couldn't agree more, Captain. No mercy for that vermin.

CB: Exactly. If we get it wrong once in a while, that's just the cost of keeping our people safe.

[The audio ends with the sound of footsteps and muffled conversation fading away]

As the situation develops, we will continue to provide updates and analysis on the legal and political implications of this startling revelation. The leaked audio transcript has undoubtedly added a new dimension to the ongoing discussions surrounding the conflict and the responsibility of military officers like Captain Ames Bannister.
